With four Dec. 4 New Hampshire primary contests already lined up and five more presidential primaries set for January, the 2016 presidential race has officially been "officially" declared by the campaigns. (The five primaries include Massachusetts, Minnesota, Michigan, Arizona and Mississippi.) All told, there will be 17 national contests this election cycle, and New Hampshire is committed to set a Feb. 9 primary at noon, more than a month before the Iowa caucuses will kick off the process on Feb. 1. Although presidential campaigning has reached a fever pitch of activity, New Hampshire hasn't been turned upside-down like the other early states. At least not yet. Candidates need to register at least 225,000 signatures from individuals or political groups within their state — even though the Obama campaign got around the problem of low petition numbers by collecting signatures for its 2008 and 2012 presidential campaigns from thousands of New Hampshire residents. In the end, New Hampshire officials tallied 61,090 signatures in total, some of which were duplicates or invalid. That
