ath: the first stop on the society annihilation is the black community, that's why they make fun of my african american ass so much. We get it. We understand. We are your internet nigger. Look, I get that. This was a very simple message. It wasn't a meme. It wasn't a ha ha comment about rape and a shower. It's a simple, black person telling white people that they hate them. This isn't an out of context post. It was a full page on the subreddit (nevermind that they've made other posts to that effect as well). It was full of "this is me, this is my perspective, here's why I'm offended by your comment, let me explain why, and this is why you're an asshole for saying that, and this is how you're making me feel even worse." Not only do they not understand the context of the meme, but they fail to see why they are seen as "this is me" and "this is my perspective". They don't understand that this is exactly what makes the meme so effective. The problem isn't a "problem with online communities", but rather the specific communities that exist within them. This particular subreddit, despite their shitposts, is generally pretty good about not directly linking to CP, but they tend to use these memes, as well as the people who do the shitposting, to justify their shitposting and bullying, while they try to pretend that they aren't responsible for it. In the context of that, the people who are using this subreddit to justify their shitty behaviour are being honest about what they do. That does not mean that the people they harass aren't being dishonest. You're a cuntbag who uses the internet to justify his shitty behaviour. You're a monster. You're the worst, you're a fucking asshole who wears his stupidity and ignorance on his sleeve. You know what they call them? Moderators. When the moderators act on the shitposters, they let them off the hook. When that happens, they're told "you can't 82157476af
